The federal government does not offer any land for homesteading in Alaska.

- The State of Alaska, through the Department of Natural Resources has, in the past, offered several programs that convey land to private individuals. These have included homestead, agricultural homestead, homesite, and lottery programs. The State of Alaska Division of Land has some parcels available for sale over-the-counter. - Some municipalities such as cities, boroughs (the Alaskan “county”), and universities conduct land sales or lotteries in which parcels are sold at fair market value. Contact a phone directory for listings in the area being considered.
- Land may also be purchased through the private sector. Real estate companies and classified ads are good places to research land availability. Look under land, acreage, or recreational properties in the real estate section of the classified ads.
- Alaska Native Corporations may have land for sale. Contact a phone directory for listings in the area being considered.

See the reverse side for names and addresses of agencies and newspapers that may have land sale information in your area of interest.
